I hope this is a book about universities that is also fun to read. I certainly had fun writing it. Many people have shared in its making, and to them I owe my deepest thanks. First, Roland Wenzlhuemer and his Floating Spaces group at the University of Heidelberg's Asia-Europe Cluster of Excellence, together with an early seminar at the University of Leicester and subsequent conversations with Matt Houlbrook and Erica Hanna, convinced me that there was more to the story of the Floating University than just the high jinks of a Gatsby-esque gap year. Then, an Australian Research Council Discovery Early Career Research Award (DECRA) gave me the gifts of trust and time, enabling me to develop my ideas, follow research leads, visit archives, obtain digital copies, and have conversations with colleagues across the globe. The DECRA also brought me to Sydney, where I now live. That would not have happened if Geoff Sherington had not snooped at my notes in the University of Sydney archives while I was out to lunch and subsequently introduced me to Julia Horne. They have both become trusted mentors, colleagues, collaborators, and friends. Along with Deryck Schreuder, Stephen Garton, Hannah Forsyth, Kate Darian-Smith, James Waghorne, Gwil Croucher, Joel Barnes, and the late Stuart Macintyre, I have been lucky to have them as Australian interlocutors, both on aspects of this project and on the history and politics of universities more broadly.

My first book was on academic networks in the British Empire. Universities, empire, and the social are themes that run through this study too, but here their context has shifted significantly. Several people have helped me navigate these new waters of international history and US foreign relations. I am especially grateful to Jay Sexton. First in Oxford, and now across oceans, he has been a legendary comrade and friend, generous with his ideas, his introductions, and his sociability. The chapter workshops, visits to archives, and the many wonders of Centralia that I experienced during my visit to the University of Missouri have left their mark on this manuscript. Similarly, the intellectual companionship of Katharina Rietzler and Valeska Huber has meant a great deal. Our little reading group began in London and has continued for over a decade, surviving time zones, witnessing the births of multiple children, and encompassing the vicissitudes of personal and professional life. Our ongoing conversation has been one of the great joys of my career, and it shows on so many pages of this book. Paul Kramer also has offered generous and apposite guidance. Clare Corbould has been an absolute godsend, helping me troubleshoot multiple aspects of this project and offering up her wisdom with characteristic humor and grace. I am not sure where I would have been without Kate Fullagar, who has shared her knowledge, read drafts, and sent me several “just checking in” emails when I needed them most. They both, together with Mike McDonald and Yves Rees, provided a hugely helpful close reading of an early version of this manuscript, for which I am enormously grateful. In different ways, Alecia Simmonds, Leigh Boucher, Alison Bashford, and Warwick Anderson all helped me find a way through particularly knotty problems. That their assistance was accompanied by good food, good wine, good friendship, and good gossip only makes me more grateful to them.

I have received the support of several institutions during this project. Its seeds were sown while I was at Brunel University in London, much of it was developed at University of Sydney, and it came to fruition at the University of Technology Sydney (UTS). Along the way, I have benefited from visiting fellowships, at the University of Heidelberg and in New College, Harris Manchester College, and the Rothermere American Institute at the University of Oxford, and from a Griffith Review Varuna writing residency. But institutions are tended by individuals. At UTS, I have been supremely fortunate in my colleagues, both in the social and political studies discipline group and at the Australian Centre for Public History. Their commitment to their vocation is inspiring. I am particularly grateful to Anna Clark for historical chat, institutional comradery, and friendship. The archivists and librarians who have assisted me with my research are too many to name, but their answers to my questions and preparedness to digitize their holdings have been invaluable. The research assistance of Burcu Cevik, Rebecca Crites, Molly Dias, Patrick Flood, Rosemary Hancock, Kirsten Kamphuis, Gabrielle Kemmis, Anna Kent, Yves Rees, and Sander Tetteroo has made manageable what sometimes seemed like a mammoth project. Davy Baas shared his undergraduate dissertation, Hayden Lorimer his ideas and enthusiasm for Holling C. Holling, and Heike Jöns a crucial newspaper snippet and her knowledge of Alfred Weber. Susan Liebich and Laurence Publicover invited me to be part of their edited volume Reading, Writing and Performing at Sea for Palgrave Macmillan, and the reviewers of a companion article for Diplomatic History pushed me in all the right directions. Tim Mennel and Susannah Engstrom at the University of Chicago Press have been encouraging and patient from the start. I'm grateful as well to freelance copyeditor Sandra Hazel. Together with the reports of the two anonymous readers of the manuscript, their time and attention have improved my work immensely.

I offer this book up from the middle of things. It has carried me across continents, between institutions, and through major life events. Throughout it all, Frances Flanagan has been a wise and dear friend whose intellectual imagination and insight and commitment to embeddedness I deeply admire. Frances, it is one of the great blessings of my life to owe you debts I can never repay. Mum, you may not live to see this book in print, and I'm sure that much of what I do has seemed a mystery to you; but your life has been one of service to education and its institutions, and I have never doubted your grounding love. Vita, I sent the manuscript off to the publishers the day before you were born, and every day since I have thought my heart might explode. And Ruth, my partner in marriage: thank you for making my life larger, my conversation richer, my bookcase fuller. You outbid all rivals on eBay, read all the books on Wittgenstein, and flew to New York and Copenhagen and Berlin. This book is better because of you, and so am I. As I sail my own little boat upon the seas of life, I am fortunate indeed to have you all as my companions.
